The majority of the following coins up to the end of A.D. 960 come from the collection of the coins of China formed by Colin E. Pitchfork from the early 1960s to 2000. Very few collections of this type and size have appeared in auctions in the English-speaking world. Much of this collection comes from that formed by Mr. Erich Wodak, formerly of Malaya and Melbourne, during the 1930s to the 1950s. This collection will be spread over several sales. Hartill has been used as the primary reference and consequently the catalogue has generally been arranged in that order. In addition the English version of the names used are written in Pinyin and provides a departure to the older Wade romanisation.

The Tang Dynasty is regarded as the golden age of Chinese literature and art. Commerce was stimulated by the growth of the mercantile class. Coins and cloth remained the primary types of money. Rice cost 336 cash for a hectolitre and labourers could be hired for 500 cash per month. Minting and copper extraction were centrally controlled and private casting punishable by death. The alloy for the coins was also fixed 83 percent copper, 15 percent lead and 2 percent tin. The Kai Yuan was the main coin issued by the Tang Dynasty and lasted for almost 300 years.

These Tang Dynasty issues were specially made by various emperors in attempts to overcome shortages of copper with one new coin of Gao Zong being equivalent to ten old coins. Su Zong's issues were to pay the army fighting against rebels. The illustrated double rim fifty cash were known as the "Zhong Lun" (heavy wheel) cash. They were soon devalued to thirty cash, and in 762 devalued to three cash. The last two issues were struck (as known from find spots) by local government in the Kucha area of Xinjiang and are very rare (Hartill values them at $250US each).

In 845 the Emperor Wu Zong, a Taoism follower destroyed the Buddhist monasteries and used the copper bells, gongs, burners and statues to cast coins in various localities. These local mints were under the control of the provincial governors. One governor Li Shen of Huainan province requested that he might cast coins bearing the name of the prefecture and this was allowed. Generally these coins with mint names on the reverses, known as Huichang Kai Yuans are of poor workmanship and size compared to the earlier Kai Yuan issues. The policy was changed the following year when Xuanzong became emperor and these provincial minted and named coins were recast to make Buddhist statues. Consequently these mint named issues are much scarcer than the unnamed Kai Yuan issues.

After the collapse of the Tang Dynasty in 907, another period of disunity ensued. Five officially recognised dynasties ruled consecutively in the north, while ten different kingdoms ruled at various times in the south. A shortage of copper in the north made it extremely difficult to produce adequate supplies of coins hence their rarity.

The later Zhou Dynasty issues have their design based on the Kai Yuan coins and were cast from melted down statues from Buddhist temples. It is said that the emperor himself supervised the casting from the large furnaces at the back of the palace. The coins have amuletic properties because they were made from Buddhist statues and are particularly effective in midwifery, hence the appearance of contemporary charms and the later made charm imitations.

The interrupted dumbbell Mitchiner (p.29 cited above) notes that finds of similar types as these as well as moulds were found at Oc-eo by Malleret's excavations (1959-1963) as well as contemporary Mon sites in Thailand and the Pyu site of Beikthano in the Irrawaddy valley. These are all dated to the period A.D. 200-600. Consequently the circulation of these pieces must have covered from South Vietnam, Thailand and Burma. He notes most examples are 20-30 grams but a few specimens have been observed around 50 grams. The analysis of these "dumbbell interrupted rings" show that they are almost 100% lead. The style of these dumbbells are somewhat similar to those illustrated by Mitchiner.
