Some members of Fire Police Corps saw a void in the late 1960s: no organisation to represent them with no opportunity for fire policemen to meet and discuss affairs that were of interest to them. Taranaki and Auckland, among others, formed provincial associations of Fire Police Corps to provide local contact between Fire Police. This led to thoughts of a national organisation.

In 1969 at Wanganui 15 Corps were interested enough to consider forming a nation-wide organisation of fire police. A UFBA representative who was present reiterated that membership of the UFBA was not on for Fire Police, but he offered no objection to the proposed National Association of Fire Police. In fact he said it could be formed under the stewardship of the UFBA. The new organisation was founded then and there. This representation of Fire Police continued with the National Fire Police Association holding Annual Meetings at various locations, also attended by a senior executive of the Fire Service. The Association designed and struck its own Fire Police service medals. Thus, in many cases, volunteer service by fire policemen was tangibly recognised for the first time. (Some Fire Police had, however, previously been receiving service honours provided by Fire Boards).

The Legion of Frontiersmen was formed in New Zealand in 1911 to assist the authorities in states of emergency, such as fires, floods, earthquakes and other disasters where the use of additional trained men are needed at short notice. Many other duties are carried out, and members are expected to assist in promoting the British way of life and loyalty to the Throne. The performance of all duties is on a voluntary basis with no payment being made to the individual for services rendered. Membership of the Legion is available to any male 21 years of age and over, British by birth or naturalisation and of good character. (Information from 1991, courtesy Oldham & Delahunt).
