From the N.Z. Herald 15 December 1904. Courtesy National Library of New Zealand - Papers Past.

"At the presentation of prizes to the pupils of the Auckland Grammar School, to take place in the Choral Hall to-night, a challenge vase will be presented which has an historic interest, having been in Auckland 47 years, and competed for by Auckland volunteers as far back as 1859. This is the Campbell Champion Challenge Vase, presented by Sir John Logan Campbell, who, though the fact has not often been publicly referred to, inaugurated the Auckland Volunteer Rifle Corps. In 1859 his silver vase, the same trophy which will appear at the Grammar School presentation tonight, was first shot for. Sir John Logan Campbell is justifiably proud of his connection with the volunteer movement in Auckland. His inauguration of the Auckland Volunteer Corps in 1855 was prior to the great volunteer movement in the Old Country, which took practical form with the first grand reviews held in London and Edinburgh. This prize is only held by the winner for a year, when it is again competed for. As a further incentive to induce competition, the winner now receives a silver medal, a very beautiful work of art, upon which is inscribed his name, and which becomes his property".

Sir John Logan Campbell (1817-1912) was a notable figure, he was described by many as 'the father of Auckland'. He was a politician and served as Mayor of Auckland for a brief period in 1901.

The gold medal features a portrait of Campbell and was obviously a later upgrade from the silver award mentioned in the 'Herald' article of 1904.

SS Elingamite was an Australian passenger steamer of 2,585 tons, built in 1887, and owned by Huddart Parker. The ship was wrecked in 1902 off the north coast of New Zealand carrying a large consignment of gold. Now the Elingamite wreck is a favourite site for adventurous divers because of the drama associated with it, and wild tales of lost treasure.

Elingamite arrived at Sydney, on 22 November 1887, having departed from Newcastle upon Tyne in England on 24 September, where she had been built by C.S.Swan & Hunter. She was a steel-hulled screw steamer 320 feet (98 m) long, 40 feet 9 inches (12.42m) in the beam, with a depth of 22 feet 3 inches (6.78m). She was powered by triple-expansion compound steam engines, built by the Wallsend Slipway & Engineering Company, which gave her a top speed of 11 knots (20km/h; 13mph). There was accommodation for 100 passengers in 1st class, and another 100 in steerage. The Victorian government had selected her for use as an armed cruiser, and she had fittings in place for four Armstrong 36-pounder guns (two forward and two aft), and machine-guns amidships. She was schooner-rigged on two pole masts.

Elingamite left Sydney early on Sunday morning, 5 November 1902, on the regular Tasman Sea run between Sydney and Auckland. Captain Ernest Atwood was in charge. On board were 136 passengers and 58 crew, and a consignment of 52 boxes of coins for banks in New Zealand, including 6,000 gold half-sovereigns.

The voyage was uneventful until mid-morning on the 9th when the ship suddenly encountered thick fog. Captain Atwood took necessary precautions, but the vessel struck West Island, one of the islands in the Three Kings group, about 35 nautical miles (65km) north of Cape Reinga on the northern tip of mainland New Zealand.

The vessel foundered and sank within 20 minutes, but those on board managed to escape in lifeboats and rafts, some taking survivors to King Islands and some to the mainland. One lifeboat was never seen again. 45 people were killed (28 passengers and 17 crew) when the ship foundered. A party of 75 people from three boats landed on a rocky ledge on the middle King island and after two days were picked up by the SS Zealandia and taken to Auckland. A raft and a fourth boat reached the Great King island and a fifth boat with 52 people on board sailed to Houhora on the North Island, 80 miles away.

A court of enquiry into the sinking began at Auckland on 28 November and lasted about two months. Captain Atwood was found guilty of grossly negligent navigation (and on other matters), and his master's certificate was suspended.

Eight years later the Australian Naval Station reported that the Three Kings were wrongly charted. In 1911, the Terra Nova surveyed the area and established the Three Kings group to be a mile and a quarter south, and a third of a mile east, of their position shown on Captain Atwood's chart.

The enquiry was reopened and the court found that the sinking would never have happened had the chart been accurate. Captain Atwood was cleared of all charges and later became a ship surveyor at Wellington where he died in the 1930s.

Over the years there have been exaggerated claims that there was unregistered bullion aboard, and inflated tales about the true value of the coins on board when she sank. It was worth £17,320 (approximately equivalent to $2 million in 2004 US dollars) which was a lot of money, but less than claimed by urban legends. For almost 30 years the Elingamite wreck has been a favourite site for adventurous divers and although widely dispersed and now relatively scarce, some coins have been recovered. The late Kelly Tarlton ran several salvage expeditions to this wreck, during which explosives may have been used to free non-ferrous metals from solidifying precipitate and ferrous corrosion.

The wreck is now privately owned, having passed through several hands after auction of the rights to the wreck by the original insurance company.

The schooner-scow "Zingara" (185 tons) was built in 1906 at Auckland, by George Niccol, and was launched on 20 October 1906. She was well known in the intercolonial trades, and was sold to Allen, Taylor and Company on 4 May 1910, and later bought by Winstone Limited, Auckland on 6 October 1919. The "Zingara" was totally wrecked at Hokitika on 16 January 1929.
