Under Count Stephen in 1516 rich deposits of silver ore were discovered in the Bohemian basin. It rapidly became at that place a thriving mining town. In 1517 the site was renamed Jachymov - in analogy to the Erzgebirge mountain places named after saints Marienberg, Annaberg and Josef village. In 1520 Stephen and his brothers were awarded by the Czech parliament the right to mint silver coins, with one side the coat of arms and a representation of the Bohemian king (lion) and on the other side the holy Joachim with the coat of arms of the Counts of Schlick. It is noteworthy that the document still preserved, was written in Czech. It is referred to as the 'St. Joachim Thaler'. This guldengroschen enjoyed tremendous popularity and its name was quickly shortened to thaler, the name by which it was continued to be used over the next four centuries. The name still lives on today in the American dollar and the Russian ruble.

The issue is very rare. This piece has correct weight, thickness and diameter as published by Kann, however the striking is weak, it comes from different dies to the Baldwin published example. The Chinese letters in some cases shows doubling on several characters but that could be from lack of initial pressure on the dies as the dragon itself shows weakness on the high point of its scales.

The original issue is very rare. This piece has an incorrect weight (should be 37.4 g), thickness is correct but its diameter as published by Kann should be 41mm, however the striking is good, it comes from different dies to the published examples. The coin is probably a modern copy.

The ecu with long curl, (falling to the shoulder), was struck from 1646 to 1659. The predecessors of this coin, differing slightly in design, were struck for Louis XIII from 1641 and Louis XIV from 1643. These were the first French silver crowns. The silver ecu owed its origin to the sweeping reforms of monetary policy and mint practice instituted late in the reign of Louis XIII. By a series of decrees issued in the latter part of 1641, the king created a new silver standard, a coin valued at 60 sols weighing 27.44 grams, 917/1000 fine, to be struck on the presses of the Medal Mint at the Louvre.

Frederick III of Saxony began the production of talers in Germany in 1500, and the mints of Saxony moved from the capital, Dresden, to be near the mines of Annaberg, Freiberg and Schneeberg. The size of the taler offered great scope for engravers to produce fine portraits and elaborate versions of dynastic emblems for German princes. Since 1485 Saxony had been partitioned between two branches of its ruling Wettin dynasty. Duke Georg, the current ruler of Albertine or Ducal Saxony, proved to be one of Luther's most implacable enemies until he died in 1539. Friedrich the Wise's territorial section was smaller than Albertine Saxony, but he did have one crucial advantage by having the title of elector, which gave him a pivotal role in the politics of the entire Holy Roman Empire. The emperor had to be wary of Friedrich, and that became of great significance when in later years Europe's mightiest ruler was anxious to destroy Friedrich's patronage of Martin Luther.

Mansfeld is located northwest of Saxony in which the Harz mountains supplied an ample quantity of silver. Mansfeld coined a steady stream of talers in profusion for several centuries. The design of the obverse with helmeted arms dividing the date-or, as in this case, half date-and St George reverse, was mostly used from the earliest issue in 1521.

The coin type was struck 1583-1588. The wildman motif was used on many Brunswick talers of the 16th and 17th centuries, the earliest (dated) being issued by Heinrich the Younger in 1539. The wild man, was a literary and artistic invention of the medieval period. In physical appearance he differed from man mainly in his thick coat of hair, which left only his face, hands, feet - and, with wild women, breasts - bare. Elbows and knees were often exposed. A variant form of the wild man [has] him covered with a thick growth of leafy foliage rather than hair. Thought to live in remote, mountainous, and forested regions, the wild man especially flourished in the wooded or alpine regions of the German-speaking lands.

The involved history of the Brunswick duchies, lying in north central Germany between the Elbe and Weser rivers, begins about the time of Charlemagne. The Grubenhagen line was created from the old house of Brunswick in 1286. Philip I (1486-1508-1551) had four sons who ruled jointly and who died off one by one until only Philip II remained. Lubeck, on the Baltic north-east of Hamburg, was an important trading centre from the twelfth century. It was made a free city of the Empire in 1226, with the right to mint its own coins, but was restricted for war service to the town itself. It had authority to alter the town's charter at the council's will, and it ultimately became the leading town of the Hanseatic League.

Type struck from 1638-1656, and similar types from 1616. Johann Georg (1585-1656) was Elector of Saxony from 1611 as joint ruler and alone from 1615. Although Lutheran he opposed the Empire from 1631 to 1635, but Saxony was engaged on the imperial side in 1619 and, following the Peace of Prague, from 1636 to 1645. The reverse 'SA(C). ROM. IMP. ARCHIM(ARSCHALL) ET ELECT.' indicates that he is 'Archmarshall and Elector of the Holy Roman Empire'.
